This remarkable journal chronicles one mans gazing at the sky, mostly at night, and largely upside down. The author has spend a great deal of time outdoors appreciating the night sky. A lot of his observations have been from an unusual perspective: hanging upside down from a park picnic bench, for example, for a new view of trees, of sky, of the stars and planets, and especially of the many-faceted moon. The unconventional perspective is also tied to a great senses of fun with language. The wisdom gained from his nocturnal observations coalesce disciplines, philosophies and mythologies from throughout the world, from antiquity to modern times. The book is, in addition to being inspiration, scientifically hip. Its greatest value though, is its enthusiasm ad its appreciation of the galaxy we all call home.
