There are four worlds in the Egyptian universe, and they are interconnected through time and space. Time and space first emerge from the universe of Manu ('horizon of waters'). In this realm, many forms of life spring from the watery mass. Although this primordial water is full of potential, its meaning is unclear. Several possibilities are articulated but not manifested.

In the sacred literature of Egypt, references to the blessed land of Manu are often found as the heavenly resting place of the Neteru. A watery swamp is depicted here as the primeval marsh from which all life originated, individual and collective. A cosmic power enters the cyclic state of quiescence at the end of an age. At temples, this is often the image of the entrance to the sacred precincts. Diverse places such as the temple compound of Djoser at Saqqara (Old Kingdom) and the magnificent temple of Amun at Karnak (Middle Kingdom) exemplify an ageless view that all life arose from a cosmic sea by mounting columns resembling aquatic plants. The land of Manu is revealed at individual tombs of the Old Kingdom in swamp scenes depicting the deceased as an integral part of the Creation and fused with the powers inherent to its realm.
