A reporter's wild journey in the back of a Pakistani truck, through the treacherous Afghanistan-Pakistan borderlands from Karachi to Kabul.

How do you supply an entire war in landlocked Afghanistan? Mostly by truck. In the fall of 2012, award-winning journalist Matthieu Aikins found out firsthand, riding in a rickety 1993 Nissan along the U.S. supply route, from the port city of Karachi into Pakistan's scorching flatlands and lawless borderlands, then through the famed Khyber Pass and on toward the Afghan warzone. As he travels

Pakistan's derelict roadways, Aikins observes how the crucial lifeline for the Afghanistan war has become wound up not only in the shady deals of Pakistani contractors and predatory police, but also in the lives of rural Pashtuns who over the last decade have left their tribal homelands for trucking jobs in droves -- like the two hash-smoking brothers in whose cabin Aikins rides. In his six-day, 1,000-mile trip, Aikins confronts roadside bandits, Kalashnikov-wielding tribal patrols, and hawk-eyed toll guards (not to mention confinement in the truck's blazing-hot cabin). The result -- the second in the Borderlands ebook series from Foreign Policy magazine and the Pulitzer Center on Crisis Reporting -- is both a harrowing account of life on Pakistan's highways and an anatomy of the way foreign military intervention can transform a society.
