The present Work was commenced many years ago as one of a series on the subject of the history of the Pottery of all nations. It comprises the principal features in the history of the art, from the most ancient period till the decadence of the Eoman Empire. In the Oriental division it embraces the pottery of Egypt and Assyria—the two great centres of primaeval civilization. In classical antiquity it treats on the pottery of Greece and Rome; it ends by a concise account of that of the Celtic and Teutonic nations. A work has been long required which should embody the general history of the art of the ancients^ combine the information scattered through many memoirs and treatises, and give one continuous account of the rise and progress of this branch of archaeology. The technical portion of the subject has been already elaborately treated by M. Brongniart, and others, and the relation of this art to literature has been the repeated object of the investigations of the learned for the last two centuries.

The great advance recently made in the science of archaeology, by the more accurate record of discoveries, the great excavations made upon ancient sites, the new light thrown upon the subject by deeper and more minute examination of ancient authors and inscriptions, added to the immense quantity of remains now-existing in the Museums of Europe, and the collections of individuals, has given to this branch of the study of antiquity a more important place than it formerly occupied. To render the work available to those who wish to pursue the investigation further, the author has added references to all statements of the principal facts, and appendices and lists of the most important inscriptions on vases and other terracotta objects. He cannot close his labors without thanking many friends, and acknowledging the assistance and information he has received from several—amongst whom he must name, Miss Cornwallis, Mr. Layard, Mr. Newton, Mr. Norris, Mr. Dyer, Mr. A.W. Pranks, Mr. N. E. Hamilton, and Mr. Vaux. To the late Mr. Bandinel he was also more particularly indebted, as it was at his suggestion and advice that he undertook so grave a task. He can only deplore that he was not spared to aid him by his counsel, and see the completion of one portion of his great project.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

SIXTEEN years have elapsed since the first publication of this Work, and the progress of the knowledge of ancient Pottery, and discovery of new monuments, have required considerable additions and corrections to the former volumes. The two have been condensed into a single volume, as better suited for the object of the work; the headings of subjects, which broke the continuity of the text, have been omitted, their absence supplied by a full and exhaustive index. Much additional matter has been added to the different sections, and the whole corrected and revised. Reference has been made to new and important theories, and the whole subject of ancient pottery brought before the reader. In archaeology, however, the accumulating number of facts brought to light by excavations do not, on the whole, seriously alter the views already entertained, for there are many repetitions and not great varieties in the general character of the monuments of ancient art. This law particularly applies to pottery, many divisions of which have been long since classed and determined. The criteria remain much the same; fabric, contemporary art, paleography and philology have already contributed their share to the solution of the problem of the relative ages of inscribed and painted pottery. The present age, remarkable for the discovery of the mode of deciphering and reading languages supposed to be extinct, has opened new paths of inquiry, and supplied fresh data for the history of nations which had escaped the world's eye. But although the field of Greek and Roman archaeology has been almost exhausted.....
