The Klondike Letters is the fifth book in The Stinson Family Saga series. It centers on James Longley, Jr., who is married to Olivia Stinson. Three months after their marriage, on Olivia’s fifteenth birthday, James and his friend Furry McCurry head off to the Klondike to strike it rich. He promises to keep a journal and to write his wife at least once a month. This is his journal and the letters he wrote.

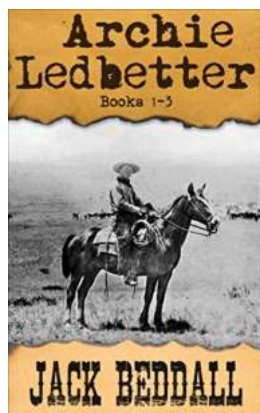

Not a single one of the tens of thousands of men and women who stampeded to the north knew what was in store for them. All of them—all of them—underestimated the months long trip, the brutal weather, and the competition for a place to mine. Dawson City changes from a desolate swamp to a bustling town of over thirty thousand in two years, in spite of burning to the ground twice. In the midst of this, the two young men manage to go boom and bust multiple times. In the end, it all becomes too much for James. He can no longer bear to be away from his wife, or to see his hard work be reduced to nothing again. He takes a risky gamble and makes a solo trip back across the mountains in the dead of winter to make it back to Idaho in time for his wife's seventeenth birthday. He thinks that he is leaving all of his pain and suffering back in the Klondike. He is wrong.
