It is hard to imagine a more colourful phase of the British Empire than that of the RAJ in India. For many people it is a time of mystery and romance in the classic style. There is much information available about the ruling British classes of the

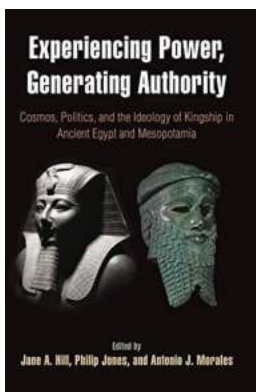

RAJ. But not a great deal about the people who enforced that rule and kept it all together – the British Soldier

This is a story of one such soldier - William Rutter. He was orphaned at an early age and looked after by his older sister for a while, but she couldn't manage him and he was taken by her to an Army recruiting office in Shoreditch at the age of not quite 14 and less than 7 stones in weight, and left to the mercies of the British Army.

This is William's story. You will read of his army life before India, his travel to India by troopship, and his friends. Share with him the experiences of route marching across India for nearly 1,000 miles to the North West Frontier and Afghanistan. There to take part in the second Afghan war, much of which has resonance with the Afghanistan's troubles of today.

The British soldier learned not to drink water but beer, to gamble, kill and march, to tell stories to each other, and they formed tight knit social groups standing apart from the ruling classes above them.

After Afghanistan, William's Battalion is transferred to Burma. There to take part in the third Burma war. We read about jungle fighting, parting and sadness. Then the journey home to England after 15 years of service for the RAJ.
