Between 1862 and 1865, Reese Howell Gronow, an ageing dandy of Parisian and London aristocratic life, compiled four volumes of reminiscences.

A handsome and popular man in his youth - who had taken part in several duels and was considered one of the best pistol shots of his day, who married again at the age of 63 - Gronow had a lot to remember and a lot to say about high society. Much of his writing was devoted to gossip, and one can be forgiven for thinking that Gronow was the model on which George MacDonald Fraser based his Harry Flashman.

But fifty years before he put pen to paper (two hundred years ago today), as a Captain in the Welsh Grenadier Guards, he fought courageously in the front line at the battle of Waterloo.

In a series of vignettes, he captures, like none before or since, the action of that long June afternoon in 1815.

As well as providing a cinematic account of battle, Gronow also paints a fascinating picture of life at the time for a British soldier, of the Duke of Wellington, of the French and Prussian armies, and of Napoleon.

Third Light Press brings you, for the first time, an edited and annotated selection of Captain Gronow's memories of the Napoleonic Wars.
