The Siege of Yorktown

With a combined force of American and French troops, Washington successfully encircled Cornwallis and his approximately 7,000 men. The siege began with a continuous bombardment of the British lines, gradually weakening their defenses.

The American and French soldiers relentlessly pressed forward, slowly closing in on the enemy.

The Naval Blockade

An equally crucial aspect of the victory at Yorktown was the French navy's blockade of Chesapeake Bay. The French Admiral de Grasse's fleet prevented the British from receiving reinforcements or supplies via sea, leaving Cornwallis stranded and unable to escape or be resupplied.

The Surrender

As the siege continued, the British forces grew weaker and more desperate. Cornwallis realized he had no choice but to surrender. On October 19, 1781, General Cornwallis formally surrendered his troops to General Washington. This event marked one of the most significant turning points in the Revolutionary War.

The Aftermath

Victory in Yorktown paved the way for the Treaty of Paris in 1783, officially ending the Revolutionary War and granting independence to the United States. The American revolutionaries had achieved what seemed impossible—defeating the mighty British Empire. The battle also highlighted the crucial role played by France in aiding the American cause, strengthening the bonds between the two nations.
